

I am Shahida from kurnool.

This is my first Shodha yathra and this is going to be the one of those unforgettable moments in my life

This Yatra transformed my understanding of creativity, proving innovation isn't confined to high-tech labs or corporate startups. It reinforced that villages are "sources, not sinks," harboring rich traditional knowledge and practical wisdom. The journey proved real education happens out in the open by observing, listening, and experiencing life directly.

Walking through rural lands cultivated deep respect for the innate intellect of farmers, artisans, and village elders. I realized impactful solutions don't need to be expensive; their worth lies in how effectively they ease human effort. Meeting Innovators made me realise how simple ideas revolutionize traditional livelihoods.

Participating in this yathra offered a grounded perspective on rural life that no textbook could ever convey. I am deeply moved by the warm hospitality and selfless kindness of villagers who welcomed us as family. Interacting directly with farmers, local children, and inventors created genuine human bonds that transcended background.

Insights from mentors like Thatha Garu and Anji Reddy Garu opened our eyes to sustainable agriculture and native plants.

Walking long distances and adapting to simple living conditions built personal resilience and confidence.

Engaging with fellow Yatris broadened my viewpoints on a particular situation, turning unfamiliar travelers into friends.

Core wisdom shared during the trip—like the advice to "forgive and forget"—offered emotional clarity and maturity.

The Yatra instilled a lasting sense of gratitude, renewed curiosity, and a commitment to lifelong learning.

Palle Srujana's model inspired us by showing how communities can solve their own problems internally. I learned that meaningful insights come from listening quietly rather than offering premature advice. Sharing paths with elders and youth created a unique cross-generational exchange of life wisdom. Disconnecting from routine clutter provided time for deep personal reflection and self-discovery. The journey permanently altered my mindset, training us to view life's obstacles as opportunities to create solutions.

The three days planted seeds of empathy, innovation, and humility that will guide our future actions.

I sincerely apologise for the late submission of my impression. Hope you will understand.
